

CAHDI, formally the Committee of Legal Advisers on Public International Law, is a committee of the Council of Europe.

It is an intergovernmental committee bringing together the legal advisers of the 47 member states of the council as well as those of observer states and organisations.

CAHDI meets twice a year.

The committee has examined a number of issues, including state succession and questions of recognition, state immunity and developments regarding the international criminal tribunals and the International Criminal Court.

History

The Committee met for the first time on 8 and 9 April 1991. It is the successor to the Council of Europe's Committee of Experts on International Law.

Stated aims

Develop the role of public international law and bring national viewpoints closer together

Share experience and practice through exchanges of views on topical issues

Create a framework for international co-operation, and so strengthen the role and influence the development of public international law by bringing legal advisers together to pool their experience

Monitor the work done by other international bodies in its areas of competence, and help member states to adopt common standpoints.

Relevant texts

There are multiple texts which are relevant for the work of CAHDI, including European treaties, for instance the European Convention for the Peaceful Settlement of Disputes, the
