

The Mahatma Gandhi Institute of Education for Peace (MGIEP) was established in New Delhi, India, in 2009. It is a UNESCO Research Institute for Asia-Pacific.

History

In 2009, the UNESCO General Conference decided to set up an institute focused on education about sustainable development in the Asia-Pacific region. In 2012, the former Director-General of UNESCO, Irina Bokova, and the former President of India, Pranab Mukherjee, launched this institute. Initially, a two-member team operated out of the UNESCO office in New Delhi. The team has expanded to over 35 members and works out of its independent office in central New Delhi. The director of the institute is Prof. Obijiofor Aginam.

Programs

UNESCO MGIEP's programs focus on social and emotional learning in education systems (K-12) and put youth (18-34 years of age) at the center of the 2030 agenda for sustainable development in order to achieve SDG 4.7.

Policy Interventions

The Institute develops policy recommendations based on its research and stakeholder engagement.

FramerSpace

FramerSpace is UNESCO MGIEP's online co-creation platform that supports the creation of online courses and connects learners to peers through artificial intelligence. The platform is GDPR compliant.
